Arizona lawmaker: Trump's healthcare bill, repeal 'the death spiral' Republican members of Congress may be voting on a healthcare bill President Donald Trump has called "mean," but one Arizona lawmaker is making an argument to the contrary. Rep. Andy Biggs (R-Ariz.) has argued that the healthcare bill passed by the House could be an opening to convincing a number of conservatives on Capitol Hill that Medicaid expansion under the Affordable Care Act isn't all bad. "There are some who believe Obamacare is just simply a train wreck. They want to repeal it and get back to real healthcare. But if you do that, there is a real risk of a death spiral with Obamacare," Biggs told The Arizona Republic on Friday. "There are some who believe that Medicaid expansion is bad policy. They don't want it in their states. They believe it's just a disaster. The bill before us today gives them a chance to repeal Obamacare and replace it with something that might work.” Arizona has had a history of not participating in the expansion of Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act. The state has allowed it in only five counties, and it has passed laws in the state that prevent the state from expanding it. While the state’s governor, Doug Ducey, has stated that he is on board with expanding Medicaid, the Arizona attorney general has passed new laws challenging the federal government’s authority to require the state to expand Medicaid. That has led a number of conservative members of Congress to say that they don't want to see Medicaid expansion in their states. "People who want to provide healthcare to a certain demographic are basically trying to force the state to expand. That's a real problem, because there are states that are not going to participate," said Biggs, adding that the rules of the House Rules Committee that is currently reviewing the American Health Care Act have prevented him from contacting the full group. While the healthcare bill that passed the House has not been finalized, Biggs said that
